Filling the repository

- This is a section within Good practices for university open-access policies.
- Adopting an OA policy is easier than implementing one, and the hardest part of implementing a "green" or repository-based policy is to insure the deposit of all the work that ought to be deposited. This section covers incentives for authors to deposit their work themselves, as well as other methods, human and machine, for getting their work into the repository. It could be considered a subsection within the section on Implementing a policy. But because it's large and still growing, we're making it a section to itself.

Advocacy and education

- An institution can reach out to its community to educate researchers on the benefits of OA, the benefits of deposit in the repository, and the mechanics of the deposit process. The idea is to explain the policy, generate interest, alleviate concerns, answer objections, and remove impediments to deposit. Examples follow:
